William Butler Yeats' quote "Education is not a filling a bucket but lighting a fire" can be considered one of the best quotes describing modern day's educational system. Author of this quote points out the importance of not just giving an information but encouraging to use and multiply it.

Coming down on one side of the fence, when teachers can only flood their students with blunt knowledge that most of them will not be able to use properly, so called "filling a bucket", on coming down the other side with teacher encouraging students for educating themselves as "lighting a fire" of their interest in getting new information constantly.

As soon as students with "filled buckets" graduate, they immediately face the world where information becomes useless very fast, so the knowledge they were given at school may mean merely anything in couple of years. The realization of their inability to be flexible with information can cause the frustration over post-graduated people. Students with "filled buckets" are grim determination of people who are not able to contribute anything new to the society they live in as those people were taught to absorb information without analysing it and prone to just blindly follow the rules given by authorities.

Inability of being flexible with knowledge beneath students cottons on to fact that most of teachers are not finding their purpose in profession as providers getting young generation being ready to face the complicated world full of different challenges and being able to float their boats in any competitive fields. This fact leads us to one of the main flaws of modern day's educational system where teachers do not feel the need of participating at the educational process in their full. If we overview the quote of William Butler

Years again we will be able to point out the main goal of any teacher which is to "light a fire" in students' minds by not only providing them with working knowledge but also encouraging them to self-improving for all of their lives.

Today is a big time for creating a new ways in educational system where teachers can not only teach, but also provide, encourage and lead younger generations to an endless possibilities that comes with ability to be flexible with upcoming information and responsible with decisions made by people in whom teachers could be able to "light a fire" which we can interpret as a desire of wanting to know more. Student with a fire in their eyes today are the foundation of a better society tomorrow.
