Education is often debated in various circles of teachers and scientists, with preserving diverging on its methodology and purpose. William Butler Yeats stated: "Education is not a filling a bucket but lighting a fire". This notion invites us to explore the idea that education is more about inspiration than mere accumulation of information.

There is a tendency to emphasize a rote memorization, ensuring students acquire a working knowledge in most of educational system. While it is essential to possess foundational knowledge, the approach lack creativity and passion. Students who are forced by grim determination, follow prescribed path, focusing on exams and outcomes rather than the joy of learning itself. The approach certainly achieves the results, but does it float your boat?

According to the author's statement, education should inspire and motivate, light the fire of the curiosity and creativity within students. When students cotton on to something that fascinates them it is transformed their whole process of learning. It is not just about acquisition, it is more about lifelong passion for discovery. Inspiration to discover can lead to big time achievements - not only in academia, but also in personal and professional life.

Teacher and methodologists must come down on one side of the fence or the other. Should they maintain traditional approach focusing on memorization, or should they adopt innovative strategies which improve motivation? It is vital to make choice between these approaches. Education, that instilling inspiration and shaping individual characteristics, will help to broaden horizons of student's mind and light the fire of passion about learning something new.
